

Prologue [Curtain Rises to Sun and Moon.]

[The Sun wilts, and the curtain rises, revealing a clock ticking the remaining words away. 12:00 strikes, chiming bells and whistles quietly, and Song steps forward confronting the murmuring glow of The Audience as they return from a long spell of sleep. Song finds an ambered instrument breathing for the first time, and takes a sip from it. Song drinks into a deeper depth from the instrument, finds its pitch, painting a melody long past remembered, stale in forgotten. Painted Melody willows ivy over arpeggio. Song continues deep into measure, until a crescent split opens from Song's forehead. The Finale reaches out of the contracting crescent split, wriggling free from birth. Silence dances with Quiet, as The Finale stands, bows, breathes, for a moment stopping the narrative music. The Finale takes the open Song and finds where the mouth goes, what strings to pluck, and what pedals sustain or dampen the color. The wilted Sun sinks to absence, mute-melodic and lightless, as The Finale plays Song's ending. All is quiet and speechless; the landscape, a whispered spindle weaving the inked ocean out. The Moon drifts up noteless, tasting light for the first time. Imagine the sound of The Moon trying to hold it, as a clock ticks the remaining words away.]

[A character wearing a Grecian mask of poetry steps forward while the shapes in the background shift into sound delicate with motion (the mouth moves, the throat catches, but no words are heard). The character continues to speak, but again, nothing is heard. This continues. The character bows, and exits. Nothing happens for a while, except for the shifting soundscape in the background.]

Words: [After the character departs, Words, unheard, takes shape with season, springs from sound.] Hello everyone. Thank you all for coming. I have so much to say, but don't really know how to begin. What you are about to see, I can only imagine. I'm nervous, truly. I have never been, nor will be, an accomplished performer. But that isn't the point. I want to share with you something truly important. You see [Singing through a muted mouth.], you are about to witness a play that calls itself a play, acts like poetry, with unprepared lines read by an unprepared cast. But remember that this play is about forgiveness led by a character who cannot forgive. [Bows, and disappears in solstice.]

A Beginning After

[The night is lit in its own dreamscape, dreaming its stars away. I don't know if the night dreams, or if that's the point. A character steps forward onto the stage. The stage blinks, and sprouts an orchid nursery. The character is introduced by the rhythmic silence as Romulus. His shoulders are hunched and wordless in a draped posture. Romulus walks into the sprouted nursery, where he is met by his screaming array of plants and discarded instruments. He tries to welcome them, but instead, his lips shape a tuneless painting, jittery and out of focus. He goes over to a sun hanging loosely by strands of static, turns the bells and whistles, water dancing over-abundant in his watering can.]

Romulus: [Finding his voice among the screaming plants.] Everyone is screaming. Why?

[The Sun begins to sing in a brassy tenor to a listening array of plants. Romulus hums along, while bobbing the watering can, feeding his plants' hungry mouths. His plants surround him: growing, dying, blooming, screaming. Red, with its roots tangled and tapped into the nutrient vein of blue, blue twisting around the tinged lips of orchids, roses before, roses after, and jasmine is scented with the wrong color. The air surrounds, breathing heavy on the petals. The Sun begins to sway to its commanding lyric, voiced and resonant. The Plants are singing as a floral choir. Some bloom wings, carried off by a harmonic breeze. Romulus, overwhelmed by image, grabs onto something staccatoed and eye-iris scented.]

The Plants: No, we're not screaming, just you.

Romulus: Everyone is screaming.

Everyone: No, just you. You are screaming.

Romulus: Maybe I'm just dreaming in a screaming way.

The Plants: What are you dreaming?

Romulus: My brother. There is so much that is wrong with that image. I'd like to think that he is growing. But even in dreams, he never is. He isn't the bloom or the bud; the word bled into the lyric.

Everyone: I'm not quite sure what that means, but it sounds beautiful, yet you were screaming.

Romulus: [Breathe. Again.] No, I need quiet.

Enter Voice from Above.

Voice: [Takes a sip of all the scents singing.] What are you trying to say?

Romulus: What am I trying to say? [A contemplative Pause is watered to thirst.] Who knows? I'm tired of greetings. Leave me alone, all of you.

[His surroundings begin to shrivel. The soil becomes salted sunlight. The Sun pales glossed to curtained Moon, no longer singing. The scene is splitting from the seams.]

My brother, he is now what
I am trying to say,
really, my brother,
constant, another present somewhere within my plants singing
my words losing what they mean to say, their intentions carried off, mine again, brother how we say 'different'
with the same syllabic
count, begin our stage again,
losing this breath
differently, these flowers
echoing the dirt,

the texture, the coloring scales,
each sequence from here on, afterwards
remember that I slept differently when you were not so close, looking back,
here I am,
in my plants, pretending
the same narrative as the last,
except here, I need to tell you that,
just that, no, I need
to write you down,
losing my breath, never read,
we are different, and I don't know if this ends
with us ending in sequence, in arms, wordlessly held together, remember when it was safe to hold you, as an impossible sharp, these written pages, delicately unbreakable, the slightest phrase tongued to language, written and ruined
in character to tell you how I—

[Rose, smoking on a cigarette, interrupts with a thorn.]

Rose: Apologies, but you were sleeping again.

[Romulus wakes in his nursery. There are crystalline cloud formations circling inside to a gray pour. The roof is can-opened by an imagined wind. The plants stare back at Romulus, not so much a look of worry, but expectation.]

Romulus: I'm not very good at it, apparently.

[It begins to rain inside. Romulus walks over to his onyx armor-plated writing desk hidden away in a mist-canopy of roses. There is an old book, drowsy and snoring gently.]

Rose: [Sees the book and grabs it. The book is titled Bloodletting in Minor Scales. Rose fondles through the pages.] Who wrote this?

[Rose looks at the cover, sees the author's name, and looks at Romulus. Rose reads out some passages.]

Romulus: [Remembering that this isn't supposed to happen.] I did. I wrote it full of blame and hope. [He hides in a page of his own doing.]

[Rose continues to read aloud.]

Rose: You're interrupting! [Fondles further pages.] Jesus! You have Heart as a character? Wait until I tell him! He'll love this.

[Romulus reaches out and plucks a petal. Rose dies, shriveling back to life inside Pantry, the Oracle of the Past, serenely stuated in pose next to his desk. Suddenly, there is a howling flash of singed orange blossom, and Pantry is caught in a trance: a vision of the past. It begins with Pantry's tongue twisting unpronounced in an atonal language (Help! Help! Canned corn on the cob! Pickled fish scales! Fermented prune juice! Lactose-infused caviar!). The trance then coils around the body, the past constricting the contortionist. Pantry in its night-brass breastplate and petal-silk veil, shifts from oval to octagonal, touched bare and wedded under the weight of memory's anachronistic gaze.]

Rose: [Frantically knocks inside Pantry seizing in recollection.] Let me out! Let me out! I didn't even get to the good part!
[Instructed by something canned and expired to burn a saged hearing horn as penitence.]

Voice: [Sings.] Let him out.

[Romulus closes his eyes, and reverts everything back from memory. Pantry smiles, free to statue again in the present.]

Rose: [Dusts off the pollen.] Jeez, I was just kidding. [Mumbles something.] I actually thought some of it was pretty good.

Romulus: [Rolls up the torn petal, smokes, breathes, remembering from memory a melody he left under the lines now molding behind a door. Sings.] Was there a purpose in your mother's suffering? Was there a purpose in your mother's suffering? Was there a purpose in your mother's suffering?

Enter Chorus.

I don't know, but she broke me into [Transmigrates (octaves are lowered and raised simultaneously).] decimals. [His eyes reflect the depth of a lost, red ocean, reflecting on the words.]

Voice: That part was beautiful.

Romulus: [Eyes revert back to still-life movement.] What was the fucking point though? [He closes his eyes. In memoria, he is back in that room, left in the conclusion of the last play, holding the conductor's baton, the finale singing away the perfect conclusion. Except the room was a stage, and he was out of breath.] This [Grabs the conductor's baton from the opening pages of Bloodletting.] looks so stupid now. [The baton blooms a rabbit to prove it. The rabbit wilts.]

Rose: [Looks up towards Voice.] I think it's time for us to leave. I don't like it when he gets like this, all [Searches.] abstract.

[Rose grays to blue petals with each step, leaving.]

Romulus: Wait! No, please, [The room, as a room, lost remembered.] stop! I—

Rose: [Gone.]

[Romulus looks up to Voice.]

Voice: [Gone.]

[Romulus looks for Pantry in the jasmine fields.]

Pantry: [Gone.]

[Romulus goes back to his writing desk and begins scribbling until he hears the conductor's baton suddenly tapping against Timpani. A phantomed Remus appears holding the conductor's baton, wearing a moonless night, shifting the wraith-whispered music to a strange tempo.]

Remus: [Tap, tap, and tap.] Shall we get started?

Romulus: [Closes his eyes.] No, I'm not ready.

[The orchestra plays a sleepless dream, as Romulus is unwritten, eye tick-twitching, wordless. No, I'm not ready.]

Character List

[There is a chair scripting the character list, leg pointing at certain parts of the narrative, coughing again nacre. The room is unrecognizable. The door is red, a closed opening. There is a sound of a sad ocean in the corner forming swells, the chair dry sinking, and underneath, origami birds screeching. Inside, fingers belonging to this room tap, a figure enters without Chair 1 noticing, enters the character list, the quiet drowning, the sad ocean in the corner now flooding, the setting upended and unrecognizable. Chair 1 turns as the figure approaches. A voice from above isn't heard. The swelling tides to red. The waves quell. The door is red, opening shut, breaking the surface, flooding over. Inside this room, there is an unrecognizable setting where Romulus sits on a chair attempting to draft a character list.]

Romulus: Che ci faccio qui? {What am I doing here?} [Drops what he was writing and continues to think on top of a stooped Chair 1.]

Chair 1: [Picks up the crumpled paper, and reads aloud, quietly.]
Character List: Character List is now bearded, wine-bottled, and wearing a sailor's outfit. He has aged salted and oceaned over. He finds himself alone, floating on his back in the middle of a sunken ocean at night. The wine bottle is lanterned, illuminating flat waves, fogged calls for help from a setting sun, and the directions he isn't floating towards. With his other empty hand, he begins pouring libations on the northern stars. A salty chill rises, ingesting everything in it. He begins to drift beyond the borders of comprehension, beyond and above the northern stars floating by. The wine bottle tips, pours out the red pigment of a new moon. The after-red liquid solidifies under the pull of tide, reaches for clouds, and becomes a hungry little sky. For a moment, his thoughts are carried off by fish glowing beneath how The Moon glows, reflecting a dripping surface. I'm lost as a reflection.

Romulus: [Translate to mother-tongue: I'm lost as a reflection.] Mi sono perso come un riflesso.

Chair 1: [Chair 1's voice grows buoyant in high tide.] All is quiet as a reflection in a turbulent ocean. Character List is drifting, trying to understand where the surface breaks. Finding it, his grip tightens in crisis, trying to draw closer to the water. His breath takes in blue as a result, sinking further. With so much attention tied to the body as flotation, the stars, left to their own devices, happily dangle in dissent from Character List's compass. How the wine is red, the ocean filled by memory, and the stars shining alongside a blue salted sun, account for Character List losing his bearings.

Romulus: Dove stai andando? {Where are you going?}

Chair 1: [Continues, while following Character List to the bottom of a lost undercurrent.] Character List reaches the bottom and breathes in. He breathes, hearing chanting from all the ocean's ghosts in confusion: Ricorda, c'è stato uno scopo nella sofferenza di tua madre? Ricorda! Ricorda! Character List breathes, completely submerged, suffocating on memory. For a moment, everything is wrong, deafening, remembered. He closes his eyes, waiting for the drowning to pass.

Romulus: [The room becomes flooded with fire and pearls. Ricorda, meaning, remember. Memory growing to ocean. No, I don't want to, hearing the slash of blue across the wrist; eyes turn to water, water to red blooming. The melodic image of the room as water fire cools back to padded walls again. Ricorda. After coughing up water and feathers.] Cosa succede dopo? {What happens next?}

Chair 1: [Growing older in its voice.] Character List opens his eyes, soggy from deafened sight. Atlas comes into focus, pulls him in, breathes a living hymn into Character List's mouth. A siren approaches, playing the wine bottle in orange-clove octaves, the wind stringed and wound to the glass body. The stars inside the compass begin to glow with percussive syncopation. The siren wears garments of struck glass, and the scent of a shipwrecked sea. The siren moves to lyric, singing the bodies of our lost songs to sleep. A red moon descends to dance. Character List and Atlas gaze into one another, not speaking the sound, the depth of it risen.

Romulus: [Eyes dark-rimmed now, the hours expired, a lack of sleep knowing what always happens next.] What happens next?