

The Brittle Star

Covered with hundreds of tiny perfect eyes, it is about the size of the average human hand.
Magnified hugely, calcium scaffolding resembles a translucent philodendron leaf.

In dreams begun on laboratory benches responsibilities are born with speculation about applications while I wonder if eyes might one day be enabled to engage in the pleasure tasks of palms.

Barbara Berman